

Professor of the Week: Dr. Clark, a professor here of the MEM, Honors, ENVS and Sociology departments, considers herself as an Environmental Sociologist. She has been involved with answering questions on the “Climate Fight”, how and why people fight over climate change and she is interested in what types of social movements are doing about it, saying that “we can all learn something that different activists use” . During her grad student years at DU Boulder, she was involved with the Oceanic Preservation Society, researching politics of fossil fuel extraction, mostly research on the Koch brothers, and on different charismatic activities to inspire people. For her, this was a very fun experience and she would love to see more student involvement with the Oceanic Preservation Society as OPS is really passionate and energetic about what they do.

Free Coaching! MEMers: We have a very unique opportunity to engage in FREE coaching (think leadership development, life or career focus, etc. – NOT therapy); usually coaches charge $100-$500/hour for this service. However, there is a new emphasis in the coaching industry re: getting certified, so people who have been coaching for years (and in some cases, decades) are now having to do 60 free hours to get their certificate. Dr. Moran has partnered with Newfield Network, a certifying body. It's a win-win. It provides you – young professionals – with an incredible (and FREE) opportunity to take your leadership/life/career to the next level and it provides NN students with clients to help them reach their 60 hours. She encourage you to take advantage of this opportunity. That said, you need to be serious about this and commit to ~6 30-minute sessions (that will be recorded, so the coach can get feedback from their coach), as well as be present and ready for every call. If you are interested, please read the coach pairing guidance document attached, and then complete the pre-coaching questionnaire. Please have the questionnaire to Dr. Moran at bmoran@western.edu by Tuesday, Feb. 16th at the latest.
